

sex talk.

answers to your questions about sex and relationships

wildfact

58% of UA students experienced more than average or tremendous stress in the past school year.

(2016 Health & Wellness Survey, n= 3,113)

I think that I enjoy sex less when I'm under stress, which seems to have negative repercussions. Usually I feel tired or more anxious about the stress I was trying to avoid in the first place, and end up functioning worse. Is this normal?

Although other sexual health issues may grab more headlines, the effect of stress on sex is a very common concern that almost everyone faces at some point. As an unavoidable fact of life, stress takes a toll on us both emotionally and physically. Few things are as uniquely sensitive to our emotional and physical balance as sex.

We all know that some amount of stress is normal, but when stress begins to pile up, it can create a negative cycle that takes away our desire for sex as well as the enjoyment we derive from it. In this cycle, anxiety from other areas negatively impacts our sex lives, and feeling "sexless" in turn reinforces that anxiety. To further compound the issue, frustrations about sexual performance in the midst of this stress tends to make matters worse.

The best way to deal with these concerns is to target the sources of stress, instead of hoping that sex itself might serve as a way out. Be honest with the fact that you don't feel sexual at the moment. By effectively addressing the factors that create stress, you will find that desire and intimacy will come back in due time.

Keep in mind that remedies for stress are all around you. Adequate sleep, plenty of exercise, a healthy diet, and time management are all good places to start. If relationship or family matters are contributing to stress, or if you just want someone to talk to, a counselor can help. Counseling & Psych Services (CAPS) at Campus Health has a highly-trained staff and can be reached at (520) 621-3334.

www.health.arizona.edu

Have a question? Email it to sextalk@email.arizona.edu

CAMPUS HEALTH

SexTalk is written by Lee Ann Hamilton, MA, CHES, David Salafsky, MPH, and Carrie Hardesty, MEd, CHES, health educators at the UA Campus Health Service.